

1. If anything was possible, what would your dream job be, and why?

If anything was possible, I could've entered an art school or a music school because my dream job was, and will still be, to be an artist. Be it someone who draws or someone who makes music, I want to be an artist. I think it goes a long way from my childhood, where I've seen arts and music being made and played by my family. It brought me to places I didn't think I'd be in and a lot of techniques I didn't know to apply and improve myself better, and that's what influenced me to be as creative as I can to be the unique artist that I want to be in the future. As much as that, art and music have made me who I am. I just need to move forward now in order for me to finance myself into getting that dream in the future.

2. Have you ever experienced a stressful situation in your past workplace (college if fresh graduate), what was it and how did you overcome it?

I had a few moments that I would consider stressful during my time in college. First, it was particularly having a group member who is very "nonchalant" during groupwork and isn't entirely participating in a report or presentation. It's giving the group members a hard time completing the work on time. I did overcome that by not choosing that same person in my group all throughout my college journey, where I would want to transfer to other groups just to not be in the same group as them. Second, and I think the last one, is the thesis journey. I think it's important to have everyone working at the same time. I really hated that time when we were all in the same room, but some weren't working on their thesis tasks. I overcame this by telling them we have our own tasks to do and that we shouldn't let others feel like they're doing too much when you're just there chilling in the same room as them, like you don't have anything to do.

3. In your previous position, what task did you find most challenging and why? What task did you enjoy most and why?

I would say that the only challenging task I considered was when I had my internship at White Coat Psychological Clinic, where we had to interview some clients, be they local or international. It always made me feel nervous about doing interviews and like it wasn't for me at all. I always felt like I could not be put into a "front desk" scenario because of it. Fortunately, our supervisor was kind enough to understand the feelings I had felt back then, and I was able to do more "back office" tasks where I encoded information about several clients and organized files. I would say it wasn't as stressful as handling interviews and probing to clients to get more details about their specific concerns. I had a fun and calm time during my internship there. Moreover, I will try to develop my probing skills, since that's really the issue when it comes to me interviewing people.

4. How would your past colleagues or managers describe your work ethic?

I am unsure about how my past colleagues or managers would describe my work ethic, but I have heard some great responses regarding it. During my internship, I was applauded for being able to work on my tasks on time, sometimes finishing before the due date. I would say that if ever I were someone who I know and have seen how I've worked or what method I am using in order to deliver a good output, I would describe Laiza as someone who's able to handle and manage tasks pretty well. I would describe it as well done. Also, when I tried to apply to McDonald's as a service crew—I was only there for one day—they said that I was such a waste because I didn't continue my training when I was doing really well in my performance with them. The only reason that stopped me was because there was little-to-no service at all when I was going home from Forbes McDonald's.

5. What personal or professional accomplishments are you most proud of?

I think if I try to resonate it with my personal hobby as an artist, I would say I'm most proud of myself for being able to do tasks better than the previous ones. I may still struggle in some parts of it along the way, but my progress is still quite noticeable throughout the entirety of it all. I have always been that person who experiments with various things so that I can have personal experiences regarding them, and by the time someone talks about them or seeks help about them, I will be able to respond well. I have always wanted people to depend on me for things that they are not familiar with. And I think I have reached that point some of the time, depending on the situation. So, I think, that is the personal accomplishment of which I am most proud, and I think I am close to mastering it to the fullest.
